Re. Point V

1. The closest available prior art is still considered to be provided by D1. This document discloses a charging device for a stack of battery cells where a switched capacitor circuit balances the charging voltage between the individual cells. The goal of the invention is low-loss energy distribution for processes running on an IC with no need for a step-down converter. Despite the quite different motivations and areas of technical applicability, the structure defined in Claim 1 can be read onto Fig 1 of D1 and hence lacks novelty in the sense of Article 33(2) PCT. The arguments of the applicant set forth in the letter dated 24.02.2005 attempting to traverse this finding are found neither convincing nor pertinent, since they at no point refer to features of Claim 1, but instead are based solely upon the motivation for the disclosed circuit and its intended field of application.
